

	Scholarly Communication: journal or papers, book chapters etc.	Science Communication: newspaper articles, social media, podcasts etc.
Topic and Scoping	Process triggered by internal/external factors • Determine content focus • Optional: write and submit abstract if necessary	Process triggered by internal/external factors • Define target group and communication objective • Optional: consultation with the communications department for support options and integration into the institution's communication strategy
Formal preparation	• Decide on open access and open data strategy, publication medium, export control, literature review • Consider regulations from funding institutions or industry partners	• Decide on communication medium or format that reaches the target group • Optional: research additional background information to create understanding and context for the target group
Editing	• Convert artifacts, findings and the knowledge generated into text and text-supplementing elements • Optional: generate more artefacts/findings • Internal review and approval by all parties involved • Describe the methodology based on the previous steps of data generation • Publish and reference artifacts and findings • Optional: publish preprint	• Convert artifacts, findings and the knowledge generated into open formats that reaches the target group • Optional: generate more artefacts/findings • Internal review and approval by all parties involved
Submission	• Submission to the publication medium, peer review and subsequent revision (backstep to editing phase), final publication • Content is more comprehensible for peers because the research data is available and its provenance is clear.	• Autonomous publication or publication of content by service providers • Optional: correction loops with service providers such as newspapers
Dissemination	• Disseminate publication in accordance with funding requirements • Target group-oriented communication by sharing text and/or research data	• Encourage discussions with the target group, obtain feedback from them • Evaluate whether the communication objective has been achieved